What format does.env file contain a bitmask? How can I make sure when I make a change to the environment variables, I don't have to change all the.env file? Thanks A: In case someone stumbles upon this, the env file contains a binary file like this: a:var:1:1 b:var:3:1 Where "a" and "b" are the defined environment variables and the value is bit 1 in my example. The meaning of each line is: a: variable name : variable separator. A comma is the default var: environment variable name, variable separator, and the prefix (in my example "foo") 1: prefix/suffix (1 in my example) : optional separator. I always add a comma. Bit 0 is usually used for ports (like http and https) whereas bit 1 for paths and so on. If you want to mask a set of variables, you can "merge" them with an OR operation: $ env | grep foo foo:1 foo:2 In my example it is simply "foo" in both of them. To merge variables together (for instance to
